Abstract:

Teaching and learning are fundamental processes in a teacher's daily activities. Successes that emanate from the processes of teaching and learning require that both the teacher and the learner understand and be able to knowingly invoke these processes and their interactions. It's significant to visualize teaching and learning not as a duality but a trinity, a grouping of three processes linked as one. The components of this teaching-learning trinity are: learning to learn, learning to teach, and teaching to learn. The connections between learning and teaching should be fully evident within the classroom environment. A blueprint for reaching this goal lies within understanding and successfully applying the processes within the teaching-learning trinity.
